Botrylloides giganteum (Sea squirt)

This organism has been detected in Marsden Cove marina, Whangarei. It has not at this time been found elsewhere in New Zealand.

WHAT IS BOTRYLLOIDES GIGANTEUM?

Botrylloides giganteum is a potentially invasive ascidian (commonly called a sea squirt) that grows in sub tropical and temperate waters, including Brazil, West Africa, California and Italy. Sea squirts are a type of marine animal.

THE THREAT

B. giganteum colonies could potentially threaten shellfish culture by smothering or weighing down submerged structures. It spreads by attaching itself to vessel hulls and niche areas and via the movement of fouled aquaculture equipment from one place to another.

WHAT DOES IT LOOK LIKE?

The surface of a B. giganteum colony is gelatinous yet stiff, unlike similar species in New Zealand which are soft. Rows of pores can be seen across much of the surface. It may also have a lumpy appearance.

WHERE IS IT LIKELY TO BE FOUND?

It appears to prefer man-made structures and human-altered environments in harbours, marinas and break walls.

HOW YOU CAN HELP

Vessels planning to leave Marsden Cove marina need to ensure their vessel hulls and niche areas are clean and free of fouling growth. If vessels are to be hauled out and cleaned, ensure that all fouling material removed from the hull is not allowed to re-enter the water and is disposed of appropriately to landfill.

Avoid spreading marine pests by:

- › Checking your vessel's hull, niche area and marine equipment for fouling before moving to a new location and clean if necessary.
- › Keeping your vessel's hull and niche areas free of fouling.
- › Making sure your vessel hull has a good, thorough and functional antifoul coating.
- › Air-drying or treating any marine equipment, for example, ropes and mooring lines prior to using them in the marine environment.

If you believe you have found this species outside of Marsden Cove marina, please call MPI on 0800 80 99 66.
